

This character 'Crybaby' represents the quiet truth of being human.

From a young age, we learn to build armor—some of us out of confidence, some out of silence, some out of pretending we're unaffected. The spikes, the plates, the heavy suit we carry aren't meant for battlefields; they're the emotional defences we collect throughout life. Every sharp edge symbolizes a moment we felt the need to appear strong, to hide softness, to protect ourselves from being hurt.

That tear is the part of ourselves we rarely admit to. It's the moment in the night when the façade slips. It's the feeling that comes after holding everything together for too long. It's the truth that despite all the armor we craft—overcompensation, humor, stoicism, distance—our humanity still leaks through.

This character is a reminder that strength is often a performance, but vulnerability is real. That we walk through life in costumes built to impress or defend, yet underneath, every one of us feels deeply. The armor doesn't make us weak or dishonest—it makes us human. It's the way we cope, navigate, and survive.

The tear doesn't contradict the armour; it completes the story. Deep within we all are a 'Crybaby'.
